311	Probably just the smart phone in general. But then there are the girls, Alexa and Google. They have made quite an impact on my life. I live alone and find myself asking questions and trying to converse sometimes out of sheer wonder how it all works and what is to come. I even thank them at times and find myself wondering why or how many others do the same. Technology is intriguing, difficult, frustrating, fascinating and utterly frightening at times but I can't see myself living without it. At 51 I have seen many advances and failures that the generation behind me would laugh or not understand how important all of this is to humanity at the end if the day. Let alone understand the impact your actions online can have on others and yourself. So back to the idea of regulation. I think there should have been more etiquette to be taught than regulation and authority laid down. But that's me and there's a whole world wide web of people like me and unlike me who need to take responsibility in keeping it real and educational and use it to better mankind than trash what we are. Oh by the way, Bluetooth technology is just too cool.	5/1/2019 11:26 PM

183	Virtual reality. It's cool to see how far we've come. Virtual reality right now is great for people with disabilities and people who are bed ridden in the hospital. It helps people with depression get away for reality and not have to worry about anything in that moment. It will only get better in the future, as people will be able to learn or teach using it. Occupations such as surgeons will be able to start learning through vr. Patients could see how they would look after an implant or surgery. Q7 Imagine you could tell a team of engineers and scientists to develop a brand new technology that does not currently exist. They will have all the money, time and resources at their disposal. What new technology would you ask them to create? Please describe.

134	I don't think tech can solve problems in the way the tech world claims. New tech often causes new problems and perpetuates inequality, see Uber. I think one of the more pressing solutions we need is in the area of climate change and reducing greenhouse gas emissions. There might be a place for high tech solutions on this but we also need lots of transformational shifts towards things like regenerative farming. I think electric cars are a worthy tech as well as investments in cheaper and more effective solar energy.	5/2/2019 4:20 PM
